

【感想】 I would like to express my utmost gratitude to Kyodokai for granting me the fund to attend the biennial conference – “10th Clean Air Asia conference (Better Air Quality 2018)” in Kuching, Malaysia. It was a great opportunity for me to meet up experts who work on improving the air quality for better health of the people. In the conference, I presented about “Needs for more scientific evidence on air pollution studies in Malaysia”. We had good discussions in the session, with some other researchers shared about their work. Indeed, commitment from all countries is one of the essential efforts in near future. Besides, I joined some interesting sessions such as the BenMAP workshop, Better Air Quality with Child Friendly Cities and Learning from the case of India. It is inspiring to see how the multidisciplinary integration had worked in implementation of policies based on scientific evidence with support of their local authorities. I also grabbed the opportunity to meet with our project collaborators and we had a fruitful discussion to proceed the project. I believe that the learning process does not stop here, as there are much that still can be done in moving towards better environment, health and well-beings.
